D, The fourth Roman letter, is almost of the same figure with that in the celebrated Βουστροφηδὸν inscription, which was brought into Britain by William Sherrard, doctor of laws, a gentleman eminent for his knowledge in many parts of curious learning; who, being consul at Smyrna, ordered it with the utmost care and diligence to be copied from a huge stone lying still at Sigeum, where the literature 2300 years ago (which was before the use of the long vowels and double consonants had obtained) shows itself not only to the wonder and admiration of the curious, but also to the great benefit and advantage of students, and criticks in the Greek tongue; especially as illustrated by the reverend and learned divine and antiquary Mr. Chishull. In this monument the angles, which are unequal, thus Δ, come nearer the form of the Roman than the modern Δ, whose angles are equal, and therefore more easily slip into the form of an Italian D, by leaving the left angle as it was, and circumflecting the two others, for the greater haste in writing; which was done soon after, as we plainly see in the noble inscription of Herodes Atticus, that learned critick and antiquary, which was graven on his pillars, exactly both in letters and spelling, after the pattern of remote ages; vid. Gruter. Inscript. p. 27. Nor is it a wonder that the Latin letters are the same with the Greek, since, Latium itself was anciently called Græcia Major. Thus much I thought fit to premise with respect to the form of the letter. As to its name, this, as well as all the other letters, the Romans seem to have called by the Greek names of Alpha, Beta, Gamma, Delta, &c. Whence Juvenal,

Hoc discunt omnes, ante Alpha & Beta, puellæ. Sat. 14, 209.

Thus also Cicero calls his country-seat at Formiæ, Digamma, because it begins with the Æolian F.

With respect to the power of this letter, it hath a middle sound between t and th; and therefore hath its place in the middle of the last rank of the mutes, being a t hardened, as t is a d softened; and both of them, as well as those of the other ranks, frequently changed into each other: for example, from μῦδος, comes mutus; from ἀκίδος, the genitive of ἀκὶ, sagitta; from ἄθης, ador; from πέρθω, perdo; from γαθέω gaudeo. Neither doth our Engliſh tongue refuſe this change, at coming from ad; what from quid; two from duo; three, and thruſt, from tres, trudo; and water from ὕδως. It alſo admits of a ſubſtitute out of the ſecond rank of its ſiſters, to ſoften its ſound, as quicquid, quicquam, quicque, for quidquid, &c. Neither doth this letter refuſe an intercourſe with three of the liquids, viz. l, n, r. To omit Greek words, wherein their mutual offices are moſt obvious, as leſs inſtructive to the younger ſort, for whoſe ſervice theſe notes upon literature, in the proper ſenſe of the word, are principally deſigned; the ancients ſaid dingua, ſedda, for lingua, ſella; cadamitas for calamitas; diſpennere for diſpendere; arventus for adventus; and this letter ſtill keeps its poſt in arbiter and arceſſio. It alſo correſponds with the ſolitary ſ, as Ρόδον, roſa. It admits before it in the ſame, or divers ſyllables of the mutes, b; as βδέω, pedo, bdellium, abdico; and g, but not in the ſame ſyllable, as, ὀγδόος, ſmaragdus: of the liquids, l, n, r, in divers ſyllables, as calda, candor, cardo: and in the Latin tertius, and the Engliſh Third, you have all the three of the laſt rank exemplified. In the prepoſition ad, d may keep its place almoſt before any conſonant, or be changed into the conſonant of the beginning word, except b, v, and j; as adcurro, or accurro, &c. but the change is more uſual in many words, to make the pronunciation ſofter, or quicker; for we ſeldom vrite adcommodo, adcuſo, &c. in theſe caſes indeed uſe is the beſt rule. This letter was alſo anciently uſed to prevent the colliſion of two vowels in different words, as Genſes med eſſe? for me eſſe, Plaut, which uſe it ſtill retains in the ſame word; as, prodes, proderam, prodire, for proes, proeram, proire, Yea, in the moſt ancient times, it was added to the preceding word even before conſonants, as it ſhould ſeem to make the ſound more maſculine, for inſtance in the Duilian or Bilian pillar, where we read In altod marid pucnandod, for In alto mari pugnando. Laſtly, in numerals D ſtands for 500; being not a letter, but rather uſed for a numeral mark, as the Greeks uſe ϛ for 6, and the Hebrews ל for 90: for the numeral note of 1000 being CIↃ, from the old ↀ, one half thereof is IↃ; which, for the more ſpeedy writing, being drawn cloſe together, makes D. ---

E, the ſecond vowel, and fifth letter in the alphabet, receives its origin from the Hebrew ה, to which it anſwers in alphabetical order, and from which alſo it takes its figure: for by turning it to the right, to comply with our way of writing, it ſtands thus ה; and by taking the ſeparate perpending line, and joining it traverſe to the foot, that it may anſwer the top line, we eaſily form E. There is indeed another figure of the Greek letter, but later, viz. Є, which our Saxon anceſtors borrowed from them without any variation. This letter was both long and ſhort in the old Greek, as it is ſtill in moſt languages, who pronounce λέγω, and λήγω, though of a quite different ſenſe, and innumerable ſuch words, after the ſame manner; from which ambiguity often ariſeth. To obviate this, and perhaps ſome other inconveniencies, they invented H to expreſs the long ſound, or, to ſpeak more properly, they robbed their alphabet of one of its letters, which were but ſixteen, and ſupplied the want of it by a mark of aſpiration, writing ἧθμὸς for ΗΕΤΗΜΟΣ. But this only could ſupply the want of their baniſhed H in the beginning of their words, therefore they found themſelves under a neceſſity of inventing three letters more to expreſs it in the middle, namely, Θ, Η, Φ. But of this ſee more in the letter H.

To proceed, this letter E in old Greek was pronounced like ει, as ο was ſounded like υ. In Latin, it is changed into, and hath a mutual intercourſe with, all its ſiſter vowels, and they likewiſe with it; e. g. into a, as from fero comes latus, from reor, ratus; ſo alſo in like manner a is changed into e, as from tracto comes detracto; e into i, as from emo comes eximo and perimo; and in like manner i into e, as for inſtance eligans, which was written by the ancients for elegans, at Gellius informs us, 11, 2; and in ſome words theſe vowels are uſed indiſcriminately, as heri or here. Auguſtus and Livy, as we are told by Quintilian, Inſtit. Orat. 1, 7. took the liberty of writing other words, as ſibe and quaſe for ſibi and quaſi. Thus alſo upon a ſuppoſition that this way of writing came neareſt to the common pronunciation; for e in Latin, as well as Greek, was pronounced ei; whence the Romans in the three like caſes of the plural number of the third declenſion, wrote many, if not all, words indifferently in is, es, or eis, as partis, partes, or parteis; and in the accuſa-tive and ablative sing. of the same declension, in many words these terminations are indifferently used, as might be shown by innumerable examples. That e and o also are thus interchangeably used, is evident in pendo, pondus, tego, toga, and in the Greek words λέγω, λόγος, τρέπω, τρόπος; and so also o into e, as from vos comes vester; to admit that vostrum and westrum, advorsum and adversum, are read in pure writers. Lastly, the same is likewise to be observed with respect to e and u, u and e, as for instance, in percello, perculi, perculsum; juro, dejero, pejero. In the composition of diphthongs e is a prepositive only in two words, namely, hei and heu; but is subjunctive after innumerable words in a, as aedes, aeger, &c. It is subjunctive also after o in words derived from the Greek diphthong οι as for instance in οἶστρος, which makes oestras, Οἰδίπους, Oedipus. A.

F f Roman, and now in common use; F f Ital. which also is in modern use; ff f in old English, as commonly called, though long after the time of the Saxons, in modern use, but chiefly in acts of parliament and proclamations, the sixth letter in the Hebrew, Latin, and many other alphabets, may seem to have lost its place and figure in the Greek alphabet now used; but however its place is supplied in the numerals by ϛ, which is called, Βαῦ ἐπίσημον, and its power of being a vowel, consonant, and quiescent letter, which it had in the old Greek alphabet, is still otherwise made up. This sixth Cadmean letter answering to ו was first turned to the left, as its original, thus, ⅎ, and afterwards to the right F. The Eolians used the former way, and turned it upside down, thus, ⅎ. These people used it before soft vowels, writing ⅎοἶνος for οἶνος; for an aspirate, as, ⅎολος for ὅλος; also in the middle of words to stop a gap between two vowels, in order to prevent their collision, as οⅎις for ὄϊς. The old Latins also received it from them, only turning it to the right hand, and setting it upright as we now use it. They, as well as the Eolians, used it for h, both in the beginning and middle of words, writing fordeum, for hordeum, vefo for veho; and sometimes they turned it into v, instead of οⅎις, writing ovis, thereby showing its affinity to the Hebrew vau. This letter being in the form of two Γ's clapt one upon another, perhaps through the supineness, or ignorance, of Grammarians, was, and so continues to be, called digamma. Certain it is, that there is no affinity between the power of f and g. In after times, this letter growing into disuse among all the Greeks, they cut an o into two parts, the former whereof they placed upon words which anciently had begun with the letter h, or its substitute ⅎ, and the other half upon such as began with a soft vowel. The Latins also, both in the beginning and middle of words aspirated, resumed the old letter h, instead of fostis writing hostis, and instead of trafo, traho. But though its place and analogous use favour its descent from the Hebrew vau, yet perhaps as much may be said for its pedigree from the Hebrew פ, and so may make it difficult to determine in that matter. As to its figure, it may be as well formed from ו, turning it to the right hand, and adding the middle declining line, as above; or from the final ף by turning it, and joining to the middle a small line taken from the top; or from the old Greek Γ, by taking its short leg and joining it to the belly. But when we carefully attend to the sound and power of this letter, we cannot but observe that it comes nearer to the sound of פ phe, and φ phi, than vi and vi, as our Western people sound it. And in Latin words of Hebrew extraction, פ is more generally changed into f than v. Thus from the Hebrew פרא comes the Greek φήρ, and the Latin fera; from פור, fors; from פוך, fucus, &c. But since from what has been said may be gathered its relation to ו in place and primitive use, and perhaps in its figure, but that in sound at least it seems more nearly related to the Hebrew פ or the Greek Φ, we may conclude it participates of both. And I am inclined to think, that a very probable reason may be given for such a conclusion, and why the ancient Greeks so early dismissed this letter: namely, because having otherwise supplied the uses it had from the primitive ו, finding its sound nearly related to their Φ, they concluded they had no further occasion for it, and so left it out. But whether it come nearer to v or ph, this is certain, whatever some great men may have argued to the contrary, that it is a mute, and of the first rank also. Nor is it any argument of its being a liquid, that we put e before it, calling it ef, analogous to the liquids el, em, en, er (for so by the way we ought to call that letter, not ar, if we would keep to analogy) whereas in the mutes we pronounce e afterwards, as be, ce, &c. For this custom hath no foundation in the nature of the letter itself, nor in the Hebrew or Greek tongues, who say not ep and eph, but pe and phe, pi and phi; but hath obtained from the hypercriticism, perverseness, ignorance, or inadvertency, of Grammarians. And indeed, if this custom would prove it a semivowel, we must also adopt s into the family of the liquids; and, what is still more absurd, make a semivowel of two consonants, whereof at least they confess one to be a mute, namely x, which they call ex with as much reason as they call f, ef. Besides, f precedes the liquids l and r in the same syllable, as in flos, fraus, &c. and surely in Latin words two liquids cannot begin a syllable. A.

G g Latin, 𝔊 𝔤 in the old black English letter, as commonly called, in Hebrew ג, in Greek Γ γ, in both which tongues it is the third Letter, was not in use amongst the Romans till about the second Punick war, being first introduced by Sp. Carvilius, as Plutarch informs us in his 54th Roman Problem; nor did they then admit it into its third place, invaded by the usurper c, and now settled by prescription: however, they placed it in a good neighbourhood, between its kindred f and h, which, upon occasion, mutually serve eath other. But though c may justly be called an usurper with respect to its order in the alphabet, we may allow it a kind of right, by having been invested with the power and sound of g. For it is certain that the old Romans, who wrote pucna and Carthaco, read pugna, and Carthago; otherwise, after the admission of g, they would still have retained the pristine c in these and the like words. If any should ask how the ancient Romans could know before this letter g came into use, where and in what words to pronounce either sound? it must be answered, by use alone: For that this might be known so, may be exemplified by a hundred instances in our own language; to give only one, we are at no loss how to sound that and thatch, the and theme, this and thistle, thou and thousand, thus and thumb; and innumerable words of this kind. This indeed must be owned, that to give several sounds to one and the same letter, makes any language, and particularly our own, as in the above instance, more difficult to be learned, and especially by foreigners. To remedy which inconvenience, the Romans seem to have taken in the letter g. And here I cannot but remark how we have acted the reverse; they took in g, which they had not, to make their own tongue more easy; we have laid aside p and ȝ which we had, to make ours more difficult; which is very unaccountable.

But to proceed; from the Hebrew ג Gimel, which was emphatically called Gamla, from גמל a camel, because of the bunch on its back, the Greeks gave it the name of Gamma: Some think the Latin G received its figure immediately also from the same letter; others from the cognate ק, which, when turned to the right, C⅂ much resembles G. I should think that it more probably received its form immediately from the Hebrew ג, I mean from Γ, since, as I before observed, the letter c originally had the power and sound of the after-invented g, as well as its own; and so when the Romans admitted it, they might make it with good reason differ no more from c in figure, than in sound. For indeed these letters differ only thus, c is a softer g, as g is a harder c. Hence it comes to pass, that in declining, the harder g before a vowel is before a consonant changed into the softer c, as lego, legi, lectum, ago, egi, actum, &c. not legtum, agtum, which would be too hard. For this reason jungo, rego, tego, &c. in the perfect tenses, are read before the formative s, junxi, rexi, texi, not jungsi, regsi, tegsi; for so, if we may believe Isidore, before the age of Augustus such words were usually written, not by x; which, being only a more compendious way of writing, made Quintilian say, Instit. 1, 6. that the Romans might have been without it; as they might have continued to write cs, or gs, as in recs, apecs. The letter g sometimes also seems related to z, as we write indifferently zinziber and gingiber. The cognation of this letter and c is so close, that in some words either of them may be used; as Caius, or Gaius; Cneus, or Gneus; vigesimus, or vicesimus, from viginti; and they are often changed into each other: For as from viginti comes vicesimus; so from centum, is derived quingenti. In Greek this letter, being in the middle of the second rank of the mutes, is changed not only into κ, but into χ also, as in the second conjugation, which consists of this order of the mutes, may plainly be observed; for example lego, f. lecso, p. lelecha; instead of legso, lelegha, the harder sound. I cannot forbear to observe here, that both the Greeks and Romans always, and before all vowels, pronounced this letter hard, sounding γένω and genus, γίγας and gigas, as we do in get and give, never as we do in generation and ginger; which irregular and uncertain pronunciation of this letter, as well as the cognate c, proves often a great discouragement to those who desire to learn our tongue; and, together with our different sound of the vowels, makes our Latin, though much purer generally than theirs, almost as unintelligible as our English. H, English black letter 𝔥 h, English Saxon ꝺ, which seems to have received its figure from its original the Hebrew ה. The Phœnicians, most ancient Greeks, and Romans, used the same figure with our English H, which in the series of all their alphabets keeps its primitive place, being the eighth letter. The less ancient Greeks indeed, not contented that their letter E should denote both the short and long sounds, as their ancestors were, witness the divine Plato, and his voucher the lately discovered Sigean monument, having consulted to express the long sound of E, invested it with the figure and order of this letter, endeavouring to supply the want thereof in their old alphabet by a mark of aspiration over the head of its vowel, writing ἅμα, ὁδὸς, &c, instead of the old Ionick HAMA and HOΔOΣ; endeavouring, I say, for though they did it conveniently over a vowel beginning a word, they have quite left it out in the middle, writing Ἐνοδία and Ταὼς, for ENHOΔIA and, TAHΩΣ; and, where it occurred after the letter P, they have attempted it somewhat preposterously, for PHAMNOΣ, PHTΩP, ΠYPPHOΣ, &c. writing Ῥάμνος, Ῥήτωρ, Πυῤῥὸς, where the mark of aspiration is put before, but sounded after the consonant. This extermination by the Greeks, being very ancient, was probably the reason why some of the ancient grammarians, and among the rest our great Master Priscian, have controverted its title to be a letter. One argument against it is, that it is only a pure aspiration, having nothing to assert its right to the elementarian family but the figure, which, if sufficient, would so recommend the numeral notes to the same honour. But with due reverence to so great a man, that it has a power, and that it had a name also in the original, and other the most ancient dialects thereof, is very evident. Besides, if its being an aspiration proves it to be no letter, the original softer א and ה, which are often not heard in pronunciation, and the rougher ע and ח the parent of H, must be exterminated the Hebrew alphabet: and surely he would not have compared h and a numeral mark, had he reflected that the former is an individual part of a syllable, the latter the characteristick of a whole word, two quite different things. But he insists, "If it be a letter, it must either be a vowel or a consonant." Yes, certainly. And that it is no vowel, though a constant retainer to that family, may be easily granted him; nor will we endeavour to evince its being a liquid, as some have, from its near approach to the nature of a semivowel. But surely it ought not to be excluded the company of the aspirated mutes φ, ϑ, χ, which were not anciently in the Greek alphabet, and owe their place there purely to their incorporating with this letter. Surely it would be hard to exclude it. H indeed is no other than a hard aspirate, vested with the power of its mother ה, and plainly the same as χ, that is, no other than a hard aſpiration; and, in many Latin words borrowed from the Greeks, is plainly ſubſtituted for it, as χάλω, halo, χάω, hio, χάμαι, humi, &c. and in Latin michi, nichil, for mihi, nihil; which alſo may be more plain in the formation of Greek verbs ending in the ſecond order of the mutes, which conſtitute their ſecond conjugation, with that of the Latin verbs of the ſame termination; for as πλέκω, λέγω, τρέχω, move into ξ in the future tenſe; ſo dico, lego, veho, move into xi in the perfect tenſe. But others think it no letter, becauſe the Latin poets generally, and the Greek often, neglect it, treating it as if it were not there at all. This argument proves ſo much, that indeed it proves nothing at all to the purpoſe: for the final m, together with its vowel, is as much diſregarded by the Latin poets; and eſpecially the final s, which, even before a conſonant, was anciently neglected by both Greek and Roman poets: and indeed our Greek aſpiration is frequently expreſſed in Latin by s, as ἕπτα, ſepti, ἕξ, ſex; and are theſe therefore no letters?

But to proceed: This aſpirate is ſet before all the vowels, as habeo, hibeo, hio, honoro, humeo; but after no conſonant, except the three mutes p, c, t, and that only in words of a Greek original, as philoſophus, chorus, Theodorus. Servius indeed tells us, the ſame uſe had obtained in three Latin words only, viz. ſepulchrum, pulcher, orchus; the two firſt whereof ſeem to have been ſo pronounced by ſome before, and in Cicero's time, as he expreſsly affirms of pulcher. That this way of prefixing and ſubjoining h to conſonants and vowels was indeed uſed in pronunciation, but condemned by the beſt judges before Cicero's time, Catullus witneſſeth, laughing Arrius to ſcorn, Ep. 82. for the affecting to pronounce chommoda and hinſidias. Cicero truly ſoon after, knowing very well that the ancients uſed not this aſpirate inſertion, for ſome time uſed to ſay, pulcrior, Cetegus, and Kartago, yet he ſeems afterwards to have eſpouſed the aſpirate way, at leaſt in ſome words, as judging the ſound more maſculine and ſprightly; for, upon that account, as we partly learn from himſelf, but more expreſsly from A. Gellius, N. A. 2, 3. this cuſtom was introduced. However, this way, though ſparingly, and in few words uſed at firſt, grew into ſuch a ridiculous exceſs, that ſome ſaid chenturia, chorona, præcho, vid. Quint. Inſtit. Orat. 1, 5. I i, and in the black Engliſh letter 𝔍 𝔦, in the Latin I i, in Greek with little variation ι ι, all from the Hebrew י. This vowel, having the ſmalleſt ſound as well as figure, is moſt fitly ſuited to low poetical images; as in that of Ovid, Epiſt. 1, 109.

Nec mihi ſunt vires inimicos pellere tectis, where you meet with no a, and only once with o and u, but this vowel ſeven times, and the next ſmaller ſound e, as it ought, wanting one of that number. But when the ſubject riſeth, as in the ſublime, the frequent uſe of it is to be avoided. For this reaſon Virgil has in his Eneid written olli for illi nearly twenty times, but never in his Eclogues or Georgicks. Hence alſo comes the frequent change into u by the ancients, to ſtrengthen the ſound, as Jupiter Optumus Maxumus, and many other inſtances, which might be given out of the old manuſcripts of Livy, Tully, and Pliny, plainly ſhow. This vowel in Latin compounds is alſo ſubſtituted for a, as abigo, contingo, deficio, from ago, tango, facio. The ſound of this to the next ſmall vowel e is ſo near, that the Hebrew, and other dialects from that tongue, expreſſed them both by one character, before the invention of points. And the changes of i into e, and vice verſâ, in Latin derivatives from Greek, are too obvious not to be obſerved; as in μίνθα, mentha, τέγſω, tingo. Add alſo, that in many words which are purely Latin theſe vowels are indifferently written, as magè and magìs, herè and herì; Magè pollens aër, Lucr. 4, 344. Res hodie minor eſt herè quàm fuit, Juv. 3, 23. Yea many words in the accuſative and ablative caſes ſing. of the third declenſion end in em or im, e or i. Alſo in our Engliſh tongue we write indifferently imploy, ingage, incourage, indeavour, or employ, engage, &c. and many other words of the ſame kind. In making the Latin diphthongs, as in Greek, this vowel is ſubjunctive to the reſt, as aio, hei, hoi, hui, Ilythia. In numerals this, as being the ſmalleſt letter, is put for the ſmalleſt number, I, one, II, two, &c. and, ſet before the note of a larger number, ſubtracts itſelf, as IV, four, IX, nine.

J j Engliſh and Latin, wanting in the Greek, in Hebrew י, is properly, as well as the reſt of their letters, a conſonant, and hath a name as ſuch, though in favour of pronunciation they ſometimes uſe it as a vowel. We, in imitation of them, call i and j by one common name, but with this difference, that they give it a name from its conſonant uſe, we from the vocal. We have indeed invented a different figure for the conſonant, which has been too much neglected by old writers and printers. It is pronounced commonly in Latin and Engliſh, and by ſome in Hebrew words, like a ſoft g; but very faultily, except perhaps in derivatives from the Greek ζ, as Jupiter, from Ζεῦ πάτερ, where it may be allowed that harder ſound; its true pronunciation being ſofter, and approaching nearer to that of the vowel, as at this day the Germans and other adjacent nations pronounce it; their jahr and our year being founded alike. The true ſound undoubtedly is near to our y before a vowel in the ſame ſyllable; and, if we would follow analogy, this letter ought to be called yé, as we ſay bé, cé, &c. A.
